In Türkiye, people show respect to older relatives by kissing their hands, especially during holidays like Bayram. Families usually have big meals together on these special days. In Japan, people bow politely when they greet older family members, and they often gather as a family on New Year's or during the Obon Festival. In the USA, people usually greet older relatives with a hug or handshake, and families meet mostly on birthdays or Thanksgiving instead of religious holidays. All three countries respect family, but the way they show respect and the times they come together are different.

Tapescript 10.4.1

Traveling was much slower and more difficult in the past. People didn't use to have high-speed trains, airplanes, or cars. They used to travel by horse, carriage, or ship. A long trip from one city to another used to take many days or even weeks. People used to pack food and water for the journey, because there weren't any restaurants or shops on the way.

Today, traveling is much faster and more comfortable. People can fly to another country in a few hours and can drive from one city to another in just a few hours with modern cars and buses. We also have fast trains and airplanes with Wi-Fi and food services. In the past, people used to carry paper maps to find their way, but now, they use GPS on their phones or cars. However, modern travel can be more expensive, and airports and roads are often very crowded.
